After the success of "The Tudors," a new series about the life and times of Henry VIII, BBC America wants to take us to another time. The network is developing a TV show called "Young Henry VIII," but it's also hoping to do something for history enthusiasts, resurrecting a 500-year-old king and giving him a contemporary setting. "We've done shows on Henry VIII, we've done shows on the Tudors,'' said Gary Caplan, executive vice president of BBC America. "But I don't think you could get a more compelling story about 15th-century history than the more modern-day Henry.'' It's easy to see why the network might choose a slightly more modern setting. But there are other reasons, too. "We're thinking of doing a show about the English Reformation,'' said Jane Woodward Miller, co-executive producer. "We'd like to explore the rise of the crown and the support for the crown. We'd like to explore the church and put it into the 21st century. We're thinking about what happened in this period.'' The Henry of "Young Henry VIII'' will be an amalgam of the two kings, an 18-year-old version of Henry VII who is confronting a variety of challenges. Perhaps he is discovering the need to make a decision about the church, and how the church is connected with the state. He's still a little boy, so he can be immature and impulsive. The story will examine his relationships with his parents, his advisors, his siblings. "
